

The times we live in are times we haven't experienced yet, at least not as a society.

Unknown and new challenges have to be faced more than ever.

But together we are able to overcome and master those challenges.

We need everybody to work with us, so we can defeat this world-wide pandemic.

And we can.

People did this before.

People gathered to survive and overcome problems in times way harder than the one today.

People survived the post-war conditions of two World Wars.

In Germany, we have overcome the biggest inflations we could possibly imagine.

And WE claim to struggle with staying home?

I refuse to believe that this is the problem.

But this leaves just one other option.

People stopped caring about each other.

And in the case of this pandemic, they apparently also stopped caring about themselves.

The lives of people are at stake.

We risk infecting each other and possibly let someone die because of that instead of working together to stop the quickly pacing spread of the virus.

A virus that could kill our loved ones.

Loved ones we can infect.

And I think that is a burden no one wants to carry.

If you don't want to care about others, care about the ones close to you.

And for the others: Stay strong.

We work on it, too.

We all want the same thing.

That life goes back to normal.

But therefore we need to allow life to be less convenient than we are used to.

To be a part of the solution, you have to stay at home. That is all you've got to do.
